

"Powerful presentations require preparation, audience connection, effective platform skills, and dynamic visuals!"

- Paul Gibler

"In the information age and the internet era, audiences increasingly value substance over style. They are looking to speakers for guidance, wisdom, fresh ideas, and ways to improve their lives."

- Robert W. Bly

"The primary reason why speakers fail is lack of preparation. Practice may not make perfect, but it does make one better."

- Mark Sanborn

Are your new product presentations enthusiastically embraced by the sales force?

Is your sales force truly involved and engaged in the success of your new products?

Does your sales force have the tools, knowledge and expertise to develop great presentations?

There's no doubt about it: A successful new product launch is a joint effort between Sales and Marketing. Marketing designs and promotes the product or service. And Sales quickly delivers the revenue.

But is it really that simple? Not for most organizations.

For many companies, new product revenue is typically slow to generate. The delay often occurs when Marketing and Sales don't effectively collaborate to develop compelling messages and value propositions. What usually happens is this: Marketing develops a new product presentation based on the new product's features and benefits. Then, they pass the baton to Sales to present it to their customers without the level of buy-in and commitment needed to succeed.

If that scenario sounds familiar, generating revenues from new products is probably taking longer than it should be.

- What if there was an innovative approach to build sales force ownership and effective execution of your new product launches?
- What if you were able to tap into the energy, creativity and expertise of both your marketing and sales people to create presentations that resonate?
- What if you had a way to ensure the sales team projects the most important messages and value proposition of the new product?

There is a way. It's called ENGAGE.

What is ENGAGE?

ENGAGE is a creative and systematic approach that brings together the best ideas of Sales and Marketing professionals. It provides the means to skillfully plan and deliver persuasive customer presentations that motivate your customers to act. It provides a means to build excitement for new or rebranded products. WORKSHOP DESIGN

We begin by meeting with your Marketing and Sales teams to select the product(s) to focus on, agree on key messaging, and finalize desired outcomes. That information is then incorporated into the ENGAGE workshop design to ensure the content and methodology is customized to your business.

- PRE-WORK AND WEBINAR. We host a webinar outlining the workshop's purpose and the steps participants need to follow to prepare. Marketing then provides an overview of the new product or service, objectives, target market, and launch strategy.
- DAY 1 - PRESENTATION BEST PRACTICES. Participants discover best practices for preparing presentations, including the use of brainstorming tools and presentation planners to organize and sequence content. They identify methods for energizing their content to help the message come alive. They then practice and learn to present with passion and presence. All this is done as they create their own

Participants also learn ways to anticipate and respond to challenging questions that may be posed by the customer or by the panel of judges who will choose an overall winning presentation.
- IMPLEMENTATION - Within 60 days each participant is expected to deliver the presentation to the selected targets. This provides Sales and Marketing leaders with key insights as well as tangible results from the new product launch process.
